

Plants and Pets Toxic Listing

Because of their small size and unique metabolism, cats (especially) and dogs tend to be highly sensitive to poisonous plants. Many toxic substances require quick home treatment followed by immediate veterinary care. Veterinary follow up is critical to prevent secondary effects of the poison. A veterinarian can also monitor the pet for complications.

It's important to note that because of the huge number of plants in existence, the following listing can't possibly address every plant that is or may be toxic to your pet. Some plants that are generally considered to be nontoxic may cause severe symptoms in a pet with an allergy to the plant. Some plants that are not toxic could be sprayed with poisonous chemicals. Therefore, you should be concerned whenever your pet eats any type of plant and shows any signs of abnormalcy in his or her behavior or digestive system; you should contact your veterinarian immediately.

Hashish and Marijuana: Because I've received numerous emails in the past inquiring if hashish and marijuana are toxic to animals, I will make a separate notation of the plant here. All parts of the Cannabis plant is toxic to animals. Your pet may suffer from digestive upset, prolonged depression, seizures, respiratory depression, and coma. If your pet is alert, induce vomiting. Call your veterinarian immediately and observe for symptoms.
